Q: C++ exception handling - calling a constructor vs calling a method Here is a question about exception handling in C++. Currently I have a utility class (on file Util.hpp) which has some functions, one of which is isSubset which takes two vector vectors and tests whether or not one is a subset of the other. My program has an if statement in main() that will call the constructor if the vectors are of the same type and a method otherwise. Currently my understanding is that my program will call the constructor of the vector class if T has a default constructor. But if the vector class is not what is calling the function? Are the vectors always the ones calling it? In my program, if I were to have something like Base *x = new Derived(); Do the vectors always call the constructor? This does not make sense to me. Why isn't it ALWAYS x->Derived()? Or Base() is always called? What makes the difference between the two cases? If anyone can help me understand this, I would really appreciate it. A: The constructor of the vector type is always called if you use new. It's implicitly called in all other cases, and that's why you get the same behaviour with or without a constructor. The difference in behaviour in your case, is the fact that there are no constructors for your base class, and thus when you call a constructor you are effectively constructing an object of type Derived. A: Constructors are always called, but when you use new to create a pointer to a base class (which is almost always the case with a vector or a pointer-to-base) the constructor is not invoked. A: Since new always calls the default constructor of T
