Here is my code: $(document).ready(function(){ google.maps.event.addListener(marker1, 'click', function() { if(marker1.title.html()=='Co-Workers'){ document.getElementById('lat').value=marker1.position.toString(); document.getElementById('lng').value=marker1.position.toString(); document.getElementById('lat_lng').value=marker1.position.toString(); document.getElementById('submit').click(); a69d392a70

Portable JottiQ Crack+ [32|64bit]

Jotti is a free service that allows you to scan suspicious files with several antivirus programs. Jotti checks the virus databases of some of the most popular antivirus software solutions out there and shows you if the file is corrupted or infected with malware. More features and tools A: I've been using this for a while on my iPhone. This is the only app I've found that does this. It doesn't come with this functionality, but they have a free version if you do want to test it out. Q: How to detect changes in one view, and then update another? I need to detect in one view when a user changes the text of a field on the view, and then in another view update a field using that new text. In this example I only need it to update when the "id" changes. I can get it working using page, watch, and dojo.query(), but not using the dojo.connect function which is much cleaner. I also thought about using a dirty flag but to my knowledge a dirty flag can only be set from the onChange event and I don't think it would be wise to put the result of a query in a variable, only to put it in a flag. So any suggestions? ID
